Abstract

The purpose of this study was to determine whether there were differences in the prevalence of self-reported depression between men and women who had been exposed to violence during childhood and adulthood. Data from the National Longitudinal Study of Adolescent Health (N = 9,800) were used to examine the association between exposure to violence and self-reported depression among adolescents. Results showed that exposure to violence during childhood and adulthood was associated with higher rates of self-reported depression. The association between exposure to violence and self-reported depression was stronger for women than for men.

Depression is a common mental health problem that affects millions of people each year. It is characterized by feelings of sadness, loss of interest in activities, changes in appetite and sleep patterns, and thoughts of suicide (American Psychiatric Association, 2000). Depression can have serious consequences for individuals, including impaired functioning at work or school, strained relationships, and increased risk of physical illness and death (World Health Organization, 2002).

One of the most significant risk factors for depression is exposure to violence. Exposure to violence during childhood and adulthood has been found to be associated with higher rates of depression (Finkelhor & Browne, 1985; Kessler et al., 1997; Widom, 1995). Exposure to violence can lead to a sense of helplessness, fear, and mistrust, which are all factors that can contribute to the development of depression (Kessler et al., 1997).

Research has also shown that the impact of exposure to violence on depression may differ by gender. Women who have been exposed to violence are more likely than men to experience symptoms of depression (Finkelhor & Browne, 1985; Kessler et al., 1997; Widom, 1995). This may be due to a number of factors, including differences in the way men and women process trauma and cope with stress (Finkelhor & Browne, 1985).

In addition, research has shown that exposure to violence during childhood and adulthood can have long-term effects on mental health. Individuals who were exposed to violence as children are more likely to experience depression later in life (Finkelhor & Browne, 1985; Kessler et al., 1997; Widom, 1995). This suggests that exposure to violence during childhood and adulthood can have lasting effects on mental health.

Given the importance of understanding the relationship between exposure to violence and depression, it is important to continue to conduct research in this area. This study aimed to determine whether there were differences in the prevalence of self-reported depression between men and women who had been exposed to violence during childhood and adulthood. The results of this study will provide valuable information about the impact of exposure to violence on mental health and help inform efforts to prevent and treat depression.
