A free 7-day low-energy guide for ADHD brains and busy households

What's Inside

- One next step, not a new personality
- 7-day low-energy reset
- Works on a noisy morning
- For adults and ADHD households
- Free — no checkout

Start here

This is a free starter, not a new personality.

If today is a low-energy day, you still belong here. Read one page. Leave the rest.

DigitalHub makes tools for adults with ADHD, parents of ADHD kids, and households sharing routines.

Q1 is about finding each other. No checkout. No pressure. One next step at a time.

Why most systems fail

Most planners assume you have a full battery. You often do not.

Too many tabs. Forgotten steps. A list that looks like a wall.

Shame is not a strategy. Friction is the problem.

We design for the day you can only do one thing. That day still counts.

The one-next-step rule

Pick one container: a notebook, Notes app, or this PDF printed single-sided.

Write only the next physical action. Not the project. The action.

Example: not “fix mornings.” Instead: “put the mug on the counter tonight.”

When it is done, stop. Stopping is part of the system.

A 7-day low-energy reset

Day 1 — Name the struggle in one sentence. No fixing yet.

Day 2 — Choose a start time that already exists (after coffee, after school drop-off).

Day 3 — Write three “good enough” outcomes for the week. Cross two out. Keep one.

Day 4 — Body first: water, food, or a 10-minute outside walk. Then the task.

Day 5 — Clear one surface. Not the house. One surface.

Day 6 — Message one person who makes the day lighter.

Day 7 — Review without a score. What felt easier? Repeat only that.

If you live with ADHD kids

Households share executive function. The adult system has to be simple enough to run on a noisy morning.

Use visible next steps: one card, one picture, one checkbox.

Praise the start, not the finish. Starting is the skill.

Your calm is the template. A short routine beats a perfect chart you will not hang.

Keep this, skip the rest

Keep: one next step, one start time, one surface.

Skip: color-coded overhauls, 12-habit trackers, “new me Monday.”

When you want more, we will have free worksheets and, later, paid tools. Not today.

Today you already started. That is the whole point.
